Description: Scientists as Leaders is a communications training program that elevates ones abilities to effectively communicate with a variety of audiences to include those that don't necessarily share your views. Communication concepts and techniques are developed that increase your ability to convey content as well as build trust and rapport. Individualized profiles of current communication ability and enhanced capacity are provided.

The course would cover: The three levels of communications that utilize current skills extended to include audience tailoring, languages of scientists, leadership practices, social linguistics and neuro-linguistics techniques.

Prerequisites: All students must have completed the Myers-Briggs Type 2 assessment survey prior to attendance. Students will be required to go on-line to complete the survey. Completion of this survey is critical to the success of class. Once enrolled, the vendor will send each student the website in order to complete it prior to the course start date.

Benefits: Provides the skills necessary to effectively articulate the value of your group's activities and programs to various audiences. For Fort Detrick, you can select the best presenter for various audiences and various messages with confidence.

Who should attend: Anyone with responsibility to communicate with their community, peers and direct reports where the communications outcome is critical to the mission of the organization.
